Interpretation of patchwork free survival with curative resections in the era of adjuvant therapy. Patients undergoing curative resection of colorectal cancer are known to have a better prognosis than patients who undergo palliative resection; however, approximately 25% of patients with stage II and III colon cancers develop peritoneal metastases within two years of curative resection, and survival in these patients is often comparable to those with stage IV disease. Thus, patients who achieve an R0 or R1 resection may be cured with adjuvant therapy, while most patients with metastatic disease will not. In fact, it has been calculated that patients with colon cancers that are not microscopically disease free will only benefit from adjuvant therapy if the risk of disease recurrence is less than 2% per year. A mathematical model was developed to determine the probability of achieving a patient-oriented cure, defined as 5-year survival after curative resection. This model, the plot of the "curves of survival probability," demonstrates the risk of death in patients at various stages of disease. Patients may be stratified into
